Bookies were more popular prior to the internet explosion because they could take bets in person or over the phone, often illegally.

Bookmakers don't bet themselves, as they make money from charging a vig or a transaction fee.

The biggest role for bookmakers is to set the odds, often using calculations from a variety of sources, in order to receive equal money on both sides of a bet.

For example, if the bookie opens a spread at Patriots -10 against the Jets and 8

% of the money is going to the Patriots, the bookie will likely push the number higher until there is closer to an equal amount of bets on both sides.

While that may never be possible, it's best for the bookie to get equal money on each side because that leads to a higher probability of them winning money.

If the money is balanced and there is 50% of bets on each side, the bookie earns the transaction fees and comes out positive.

Bookmakers can work on their own, but they are often part of a casino.
